Central to this theoretical framework are three components: (1) acculturation orientations adopted by immigrant groups, (2) acculturation orientations adopted by the dominant culture towards specific groups of immigrants; and (3) interpersonal and intergroup relational outcomes that represent combinations of immigrants ' and the dominant culture ' s acculturation orientations.

A critical examination of acculturation theories

Instead of using boxes for the four separate sections, a Venn diagram could be used instead. This would solve the problem of transaction in between the different sections, something that is a problem with the original model. Below is what Berry ' s Model of Acculturation if it were a Venn diagram. »

Acculturation is the process of group and individual changes in culture and behaviour that result from intercultural contact. These changes have been taking place forever, and continue at an increasing pace as more and more peoples of different cultures move, meet and interact.

Berry proposed a typology of identities after acculturation experiences in a broad range of ethnic and cultural groups. 17 This model classifies people on the basis of strong or weak affiliation with host culture and culture of origin on independent dimensions. This allows for adoption of attitudes and behaviours from both the culture of origin and the newly encountered culture (integrated identity).

Further analysis of acculturation in relation to the risk of not considering quitting was performed using logistic regression. The older an individual was when he/she moved to the US (OR = 0.93, CI: 0.87, 0.98) and the more time an individual had spent in the US (OR = 0.93, CI: 0.88, 0.98) contributed significantly to the least number of quit attempts.

Acculturation refers to the acquisition of a new society's language, customs and values by immigrant individuals (Berry, 1997). The theory posits that family relationships may deteriorate when gaps arise in acculturation between parents and youth (Szapocznik & Kurtines, 1993). Quality of family relationships may decrease when youth readily adopt the new (United States) culture that tends to place high value on youth's individual rights and independence, while parents adhere to the Latino ...

This is the first book of its kind linking theory (both middle-range and grand theories from nursing and other disciplines) to research using a systematic format to evaluate the theory's applicability in research that focuses on a range of clinical populations and care delivery systems.

Should African Americans be defined as a race or as an ethnic (cultural) group? If the latter, what role does culture play in their lives and how can it be measured? This groundbreaking book argues that African Americans should be classed as a cultural group, and presents a unique scale for measuring the group's acculturation - the degree of assimilation into the dominant culture. The volume features empirical studies exploring the role of culture and acculturation in African-American behaviour, health and psychology.

Disparities in access and utilization of substance abuse treatment (SAT) among Latinas/os, accentuated by the rapid growth of this population are creating a public health issue. Among those in need of SAT, only 7.7% receive treatment and nearly half of these individuals complete SAT or continue their recovery in a controlled environment. Additionally, Latinas/os who complete SAT reported their needs were not met in treatment. Although substance abuse literature has given more consideration to environmental factors and social support in relation to treatment outcomes, current substance abuse models fail to address important contextual and cultural aspects for Latinas/os in recovery. The inclusion of acculturation in substance abuse models is needed to further our understanding of the socio cultural and contextual factors implicated in the recovery process among Latinas/os. Research that examines acculturation theories using a critical lens is needed to expand current notions of acculturation and how these theories can be applied to other populations and settings. Acculturation theorists propose the use of a multidimensional framework to explore, not only changes in higher order constructs but also in the acculturation process to inform culturally-grounded prevention programs. Specifically, investigating the role of community-based recovery settings as a catalyst for acculturation process on Latinas/os who completed SAT would shed light on parallel processes that Latinas/os experience as part of the recovery process. Research in this area is critical to inform and develop sustainable and effective substance abuse aftercare for Latinas/os. The aim of the proposed study is twofold: a) test out a multidimensional acculturation model (Schwartz and others, 2010) on a sample of 135 Latinas/os (Mage= 36.3; SD ± 10.4, 117 males, 49% immigrants) who recently completed SAT. Specifically, the proposed study examine behavioral acculturation (id est, Latina/o cultural orientation, U.S. mainstream culture orientation) and attitudinal acculturation (id est, perceptions toward the Latina/o culture and the U.S. mainstream culture) as moderators of the association between generational status (id est, immigrants and U. S. mainland-born Latinas/os who completed SAT) and alcohol and drug use in the past six months (baseline). Additionally, changes in acculturation in relation to the length of stay in Latinas/os assigned either to traditional community-based recovery homes or culturally modified community-based recovery homes are explored. The second aim is to explore the acculturation process on a sample of 84 Latina/o OH residents (Mage = 37; SD ± 10.1, 68 males, 52% U.S. mainland-born Latinas/os) using critical acculturation (Chirkov, 2009) and segmented assimilation theories (Portes and Rumbaut, 2002). Data from the six-month follow-up are employed to answer the following questions: (1) In light of the immigrant paradox, what acculturation dimensions are associated with substance abuse lifetime? (2) Does treatment setting moderate the association between length of time in OH and house process and house environment? And if so, are changes in acculturation processes correlated with acculturation dimensions? (3) Does treatment setting moderate the association between length of stay in OH and changes in social network density and composition? And 4) does treatment setting moderate the association between acculturation processes and substance use sobriety among Latina/o residents? Overall, results from the proposed analyses will provide a better understanding of how multiple acculturation dimensions operate at the individual level. Similarly, the examination of the context of reception as well as social networks in promoting sobriety is relevant for the applicability of acculturation research. More important, findings from acculturation research should provide policy makers, health providers and community members with a better understanding of the mechanisms, interpersonal dynamics, and environmental conditions that impact Latina/o immigrants and their immediate descendants' recovery process from substance abuse.

This major contribution to the understanding of Hispanics in the United States explores such topics as: adaptation to a new culture; role of the family in acculturation; ethnic identification; health and mental health service; research needs; and changing gender roles. The articles were previously published in the Hispanic Journal of Behavioral Sciences.

In recent years the topic of acculturation has evolved from a relatively minor research area to one of the most researched subjects in the field of cross-cultural psychology. This edited handbook compiles and systemizes the current state of the art by exploring the broad international scope of acculturation. A collection of the world's leading experts in the field review the various contexts for acculturation, the central theories, the groups and individuals undergoing acculturation (immigrants, refugees, indigenous people, expatriates, students and tourists) and discuss how current knowledge can be applied to make both the process and its outcome more manageable and profitable. Building on the theoretical and methodological framework of cross-cultural psychology, the authors focus specifically on the issues that arise when people from one culture move to another culture and the reciprocal adjustments, tensions and benefits involved.

The field of educational psychology draws from a variety of diverse disciplines including human development across the life span, measurement and statistics, learning and motivation, and teaching. And within these different disciplines, many other fields are featured including psychology, anthropology, education, sociology, public health, school psychology, counseling, history, and philosophy. In fact, when taught at the college or university level, educational psychology is an ambitious course that undertakes the presentation of many different topics all tied together by the theme of how the individual can best function in an "educational" setting, loosely defined as anything from pre-school through adult education. Educational psychology can be defined as the application of what we know about learning and motivation, development, and measurement and statistics to educational settings (both school- and community-based).
