The Hajji Firuz site is known for having well preserved archaeological layers on the grave-side of the burial mound. The R1b-M269 sample, labeled I2327, was found in the 'sub'-grave 'K10', which lied buried neatly under well documented layers we can date by looking at pottery and other finds in those layers.

Neolithic Settlement

Before the recent discovery of older wine from Georgia, the wine found at the Hajji Firuz Tepe archaeological site in Iran was considered the world's earliest wine. Following the excavation of Hajji Firuz Tepe, researchers analyzed the yellowish residue inside of a jar and discovered that it was grape wine.
